I'm not much of a fan of the mammy either. It's big, bulky and obstructs much of the users sight allowing both infantry & vehicles to get up, close & personal many a times. Still a seasoned player can often defend well and ward off attackers from a distance but if he's getting flanked he's in for a world of trouble. Two mediocre attackers firing from different positions usually reduces it to scrap metal in no time. I say save your money and grab a medium tank instead. It's got enough firepower, speed and manouverability to present more of a threat in the hands of an experienced player.
