Crimson, Yale is pathetically easy to get into. And he didn't even get in on his own merit. "He followed his father and grandfather."

Also, Harvard nowadays is nothing but a name. Among quite a large portion of educated people, a Harvard "education" is a joke. Once you're accepted, it's more difficult to fail than it is to graduate. And I'm sure being the son of a President played some part in Dubya's acceptance...

EDIT: A friend pointed out to me that I misspoke when I said "the son of a President." Back then, Bush Sr. wasn't yet President. He was only the director of the CIA. (Who probably has more power than the president anyway...)
