
Subject: GASP An unbiased opinion!

Posted by msgtpain on Fri, 13 Aug 2004 23:43:27 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

ViperFUD And ... you're a fucktard,

,

Actually.... he's not.

Insurance companies are run as a profit business, and they are rated based on what percentage of their premiums are returned as payments. Have you seen AAA-F ratings? Those are a combination of how customer service oriented they are, meaning, how easily a customer can file a claim and be reimbursed, as well as how high their administrative fees are, etc. To receive a triple A rating, a company must have an administrative percentage somewhere in the vicinity or lower than 30%. If they reduced the number of payments they had to make, and did not reduce the premium payments on the same scale, they would begin to run a higher profit percentage and immediately lower their ratings.. Insurance companies don't care how many people are sick, or well, or how many die.. they collect whatever they pay out realized over a 5 year span + administrative fees, and they adjust their premiums accordingly.. They wouldn't care either way if someone could be cured or not from any current illnesses.

Dr's, on the other hand, have a Hippocratic oath to consider..

The only people who stand to win or lose in a cure for cancer are the pharmaceutical companies.. and if you think they don't care either way, you're insane..
