No, being a Christian is all about focusing on how he died and all the horrible things that people have done. If you switch the stories in the bible with children stories, I don't think the kids could tell the difference.

I find you at fault for saying the challenge is living. No, the real challenge is not shooting someone in the face because people (in genral) are complete idiots and make life worse. I ask you why fight to live in order to die? I mean we are all dying with every minute that passes and in the end you just end up becoming a old man/women that wears adult diapers and needs someone to feed you. I just find it pointless to fight to live, if some one sticks a gun in your face, you just need to say #$$@ it and see if you can live.

I also find it funny you mention that living is a challenge, it seems to me all Christians just prey to their 'GOD' for their life to work out. Why don't you solve the problem yourself? I also wonder why you thank your GOD when something good happens and curse your luck when something bad happens.....why not blame your GOD? Is he not responsible for your outcome in life?

Note: I say this with basis upon the average Christian.
