i would say disposableh brings up a good point but there you go. about the story, it's good but it's only an analogy on how you should be grateful of the things you are given and things available to you. i recognised this at about halfway or so in. not a story of the credibility of jesus or the bible (and probably just as well so).

i would rather thank shopkeepers and marketers who go out day after day to sell the food; things are seldom "gifts" anymore since you need the money to receive the gifts. no man will do three hundred and fifty push ups to give other people food, unless he was sponsored or paid or what have you. waaaaaaay to much greed and selfishness in all of us, and no amount of stories and teaching will get a man to change his ways. i think it all amounts to their never being a selfless good deed among any of us..... perhaps the buddha would understand.
