That's because Christianity is an evil religion, and Christians are just trying to force their religion on others. Take the Crusades for example. Malevolent Christians invaded Muslim holy lands in the name of their "God." They slaughtered millions of benevolent, peace-loving muslims in an attempt to steal land that they claimed was sacred to them when it's sacred to muslims only. The muslims had every right to take that land from the Christians in the first place, don't you see?

The spanish should have known that Spain belonged to the Moors when they visited there in the first place. The muslim Moors were just coming over to say, "Hi," and those evil Christians killed them right then and there for worshipping Allah instead of Jehovah, so the muslims were just fighting a war of self-defense.

Oh, and don't get me started on the Spanish Inquisition. All those murderous Christians killed all of fifty Jews during the entire time it was instituted! How could a "peaceful" religion like Christianity kill fifty Jews in the name of God?

Fast forward a few hundred years, and you have Christians trying to institute prayer in the classroom. Don't they know they shouldn't try to force their religion on a captive audience? I shouldn't be forced to pray to God when I don't want to!

And how dare those Christians try to stick their "God" into my Pledge of Allegiance? I thought this was a country of religious tolerance. How could the government allow such a crime against 5% of the population who are atheists to happen?

Now, some Christians are whining about how millions of their kind are being massacred in Sudan. Well, it serves them right for being such an evil religion. It's a good thing the media isn't covering their deaths as much as they're covering the slaughter of thousands of muslims. You do know that Islam is the REAL benevolent and peaceful and that muslims are better than Christians, right?

If you honestly couldn't pick up on the sarcasm in that rant, I'll be glad to hit you on the head with a tack hammer because you are a retard.
