Now you're trying to implicate something that does not exist. Remember, when I am using a noun to refer to him, that is not a transitive verb, and is not therefore a "physical illness or disability".

This is what you seem to be implying in every single one of your posts:
An invalid cannot be a mental illness or disability.

Now, if that's incorrect, tell me, because I've obviously not been able to understand what it actually is that you're trying to argue.
However, if you can proof to me that in every possible way, that an "invalid" (Key point here! NOUN) cannot be a mental disability or illness, then I can agree with you. You have still, at no point given to me proof that is true.
