Umbral_DelaFlareYou have to understand that not all atheists have the type of mentality you do. Some of us simply refuse to believe in any religion, but we don't go around trying to enforce our rules on others. In fact, we celebrate Christmas not as the birth of the Lord, but instead as a holiday of family, friendship, and giving. Hell, I sing Christmas carols, even the ones with religious themes, and frankly, I enjoy them.

Just because some extreme Athiest fucks want to fuck with all that is related to Christianity doesn't mean that all Athiests are like that. The way I think the world should work is that people and organizations should be comfortable with whatever they say, without having to worry about people being offended. I'm not going to bend over for some snobby assholes who bitch because "OGM U SIAD CHRISTMAS MY POOR VIRGIN EARS!!111".

I'm an Athiest. I do not believe in any deity, and I intend to stay that way. However, I respect other people's beliefs, and I will do nothing to prove them otherwise.

Oh my god... that is EXACTLY how I feel. If I had read it without your name I seriously would have thought I wrote it. I don't consider myself an atheist, though... because I don't specifically believe that a god doesn't exist, but I just don't believe in any of the existing stuff. However, I do realize how much many organized religions bring people together and keep their morals high.

I, too, also celebrate Christmas as a family gathering and an opportunity to give gifts. Besides that, most of my family are non-church going Christians and Catholics and who am I to be a party pooper.
