cowmisfitwarrantolt was meant to sound stupid. Slightly because it IS true, yet people seem to be ignoring that fact when they bring across things like "You don't know how American's feel because of terrorist actions!" (or some variation thereof).

My point being there have been major terrorist acts around the world (perhaps nothing as dramatic as 9/11), yet no "war on terrorism" was declared by America. I don't intend for that statement to be regarded as an insult, rather the point in reference.

Such as the bombings in Kenya etc, we gave AID and such, we have given AID to the Israelis in their war on stopping Palestinian terrorists from killing their citizens. We always help when a major "terrorist" attack is committed, however it would only make sense that once they come to our soil, especially in the way they did, it's our responsibility to counter-attack.

Other nations that have been attacked COULD launch a war on terror if they wished, and we would back them 100% (even if it was France) they simply choose not to and to let themselves continue to be under attack.

I definitely realize that, however the point I was getting at is sitting back and doing nothing actively until it affects you directly, then complaining about how other countries don't want to act, based on the same premise of it not happening to them.
