According to GameInformer:

Quote: "...The initial reports on problems with the PSP are preadominately limited to a few things. A small number of consumers have found dead pixels or air bubbles on their screens, while the PSP in general contains a design flaw. By applying a twisting pressure when holding the unit, the UMD door clasp can release, causing the disk door to open unexpectedly..."

I personally dislike scratches, for they annoy the hell out of me, therefore I do not want to take my chances with bubbles or dead pixels. Also often I have applied twisting pressure to my NSP when playing games (Like when I get pissed playing). So that flaw is also going against me buying the system.
