JavaxcxMaybe you can provide some evidence that your administration was in full knowledge of the oil for food scandal before invading Iraq, because as far as I have researched the issue, they didn't.

That means that scandal of not, America would've still gone without the security council's authorization. So, you're still legally in the wrong and now that we have confirmation of the scandal, those other nations are in the wrong for all to see.

I distinctly remember that we knew about Oil for Palaces long before the Duelfer report. I'm too tired to look for links to it.

Quote:This is fallacious reasoning. You're saying that if the U.S. is not in violation of any laws, then when Iraq invaded Kuwait in the 1990s, they didn't violate any international law either. But wait that also means that those countries that are involved and "guilty" in the oil for food scandal aren't in violation of any international law either. Sorry, it just doesn't add up. If they are guilty, you are also guilty and vice versa. NO one is above the law, even an American.

I didn't say anything about Oil for Palaces breaking any international laws. I referred only to the inherent corruption standing in the way of UN procedures and goals.

Quote:I provided to you links regarding this issue already.

Huh? Not to my recollection.
