There's nothing wrong with SFLT's father raising his son in the fashion he wishes and to believe what he thinks his son should believe. Though what he may be teaching his son is the blind following of the Democratic party, it's his right as a parent to raise him that way.

I seek my father's help and guidance in all aspects of my life, including my personal understanding of how the world around me works. Everything I have learned about basic economic principles have so far come mostly from my dad (as well as my cousin, who has a degree in economics from UGA). Are you going to start attacking me for agreeing with a large portion of what my dad tells me?

I seem to remember Michael Moore saying somewhere that kids shouldn't listen to what their parents try to teach them about politics (or any other subject, for that matter)....
