Only thing is that I don't think this makes a difference to me. I still agree with what Zinn is saying all the way.

I have no issues with that, as long as you are citing the correct person who's views you agree with:

"I befriended several young Communists, participated in a Communist rally at Times Square carrying a sign, though, I have no memory of what it said. I watched in awe as mounted police charged into the demonstrators, smashing people with their clubs. From that moment on, I was no longer a liberal, a believer in the self-correcting character of American democracy, I was a radical, believing that something fundamental was wrong with this country...something rotten at the
