You're right, the Internet isn't an English class.

But you know what it IS?

It's a place where the main means of communication is language, and here, it's the English language, and if you can't use it correctly, you're shit out of luck.

Let me relate to you a story, kiddos. Today in my English class, we were correcting people's papers that other people in our class had written. Do you know what I came across? That's right. Someone had written "u" instead of "you" in their paper. So I turned to him, and I said: "Robby, You might want to spell out the word 'you' in your sentences."
And do you have any idea what his response was?

"Oh, haha, I probably shouldn't chat on AIM when I do my homework."

It was just as I had predicted. Do not fool yourselves into thinking you can molest my language and that it's my job to try and insinuate a meaning out of your horrible solecisms.

The moral?

Don't be gay.
