AircraftkillerSo what you're saying is that even though he was wrong, he was right? This is what I mean, you live in a bizarro world. Where wrong is right, and right is wrong! Do you have troubles telling which side is left and which side is right when you try looking at your hands, too?

That isn't even remotely what I was getting at. Let me carefully explain it to you.

He was using the word correctly and you are trying to tell him he wasn't because you didn't make the promise. Though he did have the wrong information he was still using it right because he was using the information he thought you were right. That doesn't mean he was using the word wrong just because he had the wrong information.

There you go.
