I don't see anything wrong with the policy, doesn't look like fraud to me. You have an entire week to keep the game/video (after the due date) before you get a (small) fee, if you keep it for more than a month then you're charged for the retail value of the game/video. That's more than reasonable. Instead of trying to sue Blockbuster, they should be looking at the people who are trying to get away with keeping their games/videos.

In my opinion, if you keep it more than a month, and don't pay the retail price within a short amount of time, they should be able to charge you with theft.
