SFE, take a step back and realize that not everything about the war is bad. The war was born out of illegality. And that's pretty much it. If want to get philosophical about it, there is no such thing as a war that isn't a crime no matter how justified anyone claims it to be.

The important thing now is to look at the country of Iraq and compare the situations of then with the situations of now. You're only 2 years into the campaign, and compared to say... WWII, you're going pretty slow, but the country is systematically being liberated (NOT annexed for oil) and will likely spark off a healthy distant future for Iraq.

And as for those who scream oil or not oil-- consider what will happen when Iraq becomes a stable nation. It is HIGHLY probable that crude oil contracts will be formed with just about all 1st world nations. Take a wild guess how a great deal of the war is going to be paid for. But that does not mean the war is for oil. It would be utterly dependant on the state of the Iraqi people at that time. If people are pumping oil for the west while Iraq might, say, in the future have a stalemate battle with Iran on the border, then the argument might be made. But as it stands, the oil is a commodity that is of interest when the country is stable.
