30. Remembering that Pong, the first home video game, came out in 1975, I realize I'm just on the edge of the first generation to grow up on video games. (See <http://www.classicgaming.com/museum/pong/> for a funny story about Pong's first night as an arcade game in a bar.)

I also can't help but think of the "King of the Hill" episode where a bunch of teens whup up on Hank and his pals in splatball, until Hank & co. use some old tricks to settle their score. Sometimes you get owned, sometimes you own. With any luck, I hope to be playing video games until I get old and can't see the screen anymore.
