

---

Subject: Global Warming: Katrina, Rita, Wilma: Whats next?

Posted by Renegade on Tue, 25 Oct 2005 00:14:00 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

21 named storms this hurricane season, what are everyones thoughts on global warming as well s what the United states can and or should do to help natural disaster victims?

As everyone would know if they follow weather like i do, 21 names storms in the southern Atlantic is a record, some people say its a trend, others say its global warming.

Personally, i think its global warming.

The amount of pollution we are pumping into our atmosphere is catastrophic. If we don't act, we are all going to kill ourselves as well as our planet, whether it be from the storms, heat, rain, w/e the case may be, i don't want my great-great grandkids dieing at 30 bcuz of pollution in the air.

i also think the Us needs to react faster to these disasters and stop being cheap with their releif funds.

I understand that Katrina and Rita and soon to be Wilma, will do Billions of dollars of damage but it pains me when rich SOB 's like William Gates doesn't really help these disasters alot.

The bush administration in a recent press conference stated

"Natural disasters are not our number one priority, Terrorism is a higher risk that needs our undivided attention"

Morons, i don't agree with this.

with billions of dollars of damage done, lives DESTROYED and people killed, it should become #1 priority depending on the damage.

If a big Cat 5 hits, even a Cat 4, don't you think they should start getting the funds together AS the storms progressing towards land? Not wait after it has destroyed pretty much everything in its path?

Not to mention the lack of National Guard and Paramedics that are available.

What are everyones views?

and i don't want this turning into a flame session if you guys don't mind.

Happy? Spell checked and ready to go.

---