He didn't say that the method is efficient, but it doesn't have to take insane amounts of speed or agility to "dodge" a bullet. Regardless if that only works 1/1000th of the time, it still happens that one time, and it just happening that one time makes it possible. He never said it was probable that you would dodge a bullet.

Posting it out of context didn't give the full effect. That was one of the many reiterations of the "I can dodge a bullet" comment that he'd made. it got to be rather comical in all.

Personally, if it only works 1 out of 1000 times, I dont consider that to be a viable strategy to rely on. In my experience the best way to dodge a bullet is not be in it's path in the first place. The only two times that I've ever been shot at the person doing the shooting was so drunk that my not moving probably saved my ass. (amongst other parts)
