check to see if anything is updating itself in the background, perhaps avast is downloading (or even just checking for) updates, which it will probably have still done even with it's firewall disabled (never used the program so can't say for sure).

I wouldn't think the problem is CPU related, CPU's are generally fairly reliable, and when they start going wrong they tend to screw up more than just FPS...

If you have recently formatted your hard drive is it a fair assumption to think you also reinstalled windows? Did the problem start occuring right after the reformat, or some time after that?

If you downloaded the latest drivers from the nvidia website try installing the drivers that came with the gfx card instead, some newer drivers have an odd habit of messing with renegade...
