Spontaneous generation was the thought that life originated from non-living objects. For example, flies being created by a slab of rotting meat. This was a widely held scientific belief during its heyday.

My point is that scientific theory is simply nothing more than theory. It may take extensive testing to come to its acceptance as a theory, but it remains nothing but a theory - there is nothing proven in science, because facts in science continually change on a daily basis.

I know what spontaneous generation is and I know what you were trying to say...I just don't see how that affects my arguement in the slightest. You might as well have told us that you like zebras..
