Perhaps if Enforcer showed you the rest of his log, instead of just what supports his flimsy points, you'd understand. You, warranto, did not make the child argument, although plenty of other people I've had this discussion with have made it, including some random mod the day I was banned from UN. That paragraph wasn't aimed at you. Sorry for the misunderstanding.

I submit that UN is NOT a private server, but a public one, since it has no password. If it were a passworded server and I barged in, it'd be a different story, and I'd have nothing to complain about.

And I don't think there needs to be a "feel free to swear" sign on a street corner. Most street corners don't have signs that say "feel free to breathe". Most public restrooms don't have signs that say "feel free to urinate", but people do it anyway. Does that mean they should be banned from the restroom?

If it wasn't aimed at me, then that's ok. I can see your point then.

Private does not mean passworded. Private means that it is run by the general public, and is free to do as it pleases.

The only problem with your latest comparison is that with the later two, you are describing functions that the place is designed to do (for argument's sake, lets assume every place is "designed" to allow you to breathe). A restroom is designed specifically for you to urinate, but no street corner is designed specifically for you to swear. If you want to design a building where people would be encouraged and free to swear as much as they want, whenever they want, go ahead. I'm sure that the government would cause you to put warning signs about it though.
