Remember this, though. No one can tell you what to believe, only what they believe. The rest is up to you.

As for me, I could not understand the 'invented' faiths. I tried incorporating science to make a judgment, but it only contributed to a Creationist view. All existence must come from a prior source. Evolution among other faiths removes any primary source in such a way as to dictate that existence originates from... existence?

I also hear the "Well, I'll believe God when I see Him" deal. Good argument. I can't see my eyes, but I'm pretty sure I have some. I can't see entropy, yet entropy is one of the most powerful governing controls of this existence. Besides, by the time you see God, it's a bit too late to have a second opinion.

Think what you will, but Atheism is still a faith... the faith that there is no God. Better hope you're right on that one.

As for the "well, a kind and just God wouldn't make people go to Hell" deal; Hell was not meant for humans. We screwed that one up with Adam. Besides, no one has to go to Hell. What makes it so hard to admit to doing wrong? And (as some people have), to denounce God and risk Hell just because God offered a way out of it? Where's the sense in that?

"The churches only exist to get money." Sure. This makes some sense. I'll pay 30% of what I make to the government in income taxes, pay taxes on postage, taxes on every single thing I buy, on inheritances, and on my own house! Sure! Why not? But God forbid I give 10% of what I make to an organization whose only income is inconsistent donations...

Razgriz out.

What the heck made me type like that? There should have been twice as many grammar errors.
