Blazer wrote on Thu, 17 August 2006 02:35: Of course we all know that in a real battle, the Empire would be crushed like eggshells. This argument has gone on for decades, but it pretty much comes down to "torp at warp". Federation ships are capable of controlling their travel and weapons while at warp speed. The empire ships can only make Hyperspace jumps, that they must precisely calculate beforehand and have no control over until they complete the jump.

Several ways which the federation would own the Empire:

1. Firing weapons at warp speed. Star destroyers etc couldn't hope to hit them with their pitiful turbo lasers.
2. Antimater spread. Federation ships have the ability to fire bursts of antimatter which pretty much annihilate anything.
3. Transporter technology. Federation ships could beam some torpedoes inside enemy vessels, or beam darth vader out into space...lol
4. Superior armor. Even without their shields, there are many Federation ships like the U.S.S. Defiant, that have armor that can withstand sustained phaser fire. Heck while we are at it:
5. The U.S.S. Defiant. The defiant has superior armor, shields, and weapons. The defiant is also equipped with a cloaking device, so they could uncloak, unleash a volley of fire, and then dissappear. I would imagine that the Defiant could single-handedly wipe out the entire fleet of the Empire.
6. The Borg. The federation could just notify the Borg of where to find the Empire, and they would go to own them, especially when they found out they have a damn ROUND ship, which would surely offend the Borg with their square cubes. Just kidding of course, as the borg scout vessels are spherical.

P.S. This post is in jest. I have no desire to ignite a star trek vs star wars flamefest. You forgot the trump card.
