Hell yes. But in the form of sending armed missiles to him from the sky.

More to the point. Many countries have nukes. England, France, Russia, Canada (they have some US nukes from the NATO alliances of the Cold War), Pakistan, India, Israel, former USSR countries, and the USA (We have the most...combined) to name a few. Most of these countries have signed treaties to not use them and disarm/destroy them after seeing just how powerful they are. The USA even bought up most of the former USSR's nuke to disarm and keep out of terrorist hands.

Hydrogen and Neutron bombs are another story. All of those were made during the cold war and are not allowed to be armed by those Non-nuclear treaties.

ATM, the only real concern is a war between North Korea and Japan/China. They are blocked on all sides by armies or navies, I doubt they'll sneak out a nuke, however, they may sneak out information. But, the US will probably not rally to war as most of you seem to think. It is more financially feasible for us to stay out of it. I'll list the reasons if you'd like, but I'm feeling lazy atm.

As for WWIII, you are quite wrong. They lack any ability to hurl any guided or unguided missile (let alone one with a nuclear payload) to the US, any European country, and BARELY have the ability to hit Japan. So, chances are, at the absolute worst, they'll either toss em into South Korea, China, or Japan or do some other act to coerce them into war and a Korean theater will open that'll end in a fight (armed or unarmed) between China and South Korea over control of the conquered North Korea. Not saying other countries won't join in, but I seriously doubt any North Korean allies having the balls or ability to help them or that it won't be an ugly long war, but that it won't be an apocalypse, WWIII, or some nuclear show of arms.

I feel sorry for the south Koreans...
