Accessory:

The act of helping someone commit a crime. Having knowledge of a crime does not constitute this.

Quote: A person who learns of the crime after it is committed and helps the criminal to conceal it, or aids the criminal in escaping, or simply fails to report the crime, is known as an "accessory after the fact".

Ah, I see now. I guess this is why people from different countries shouldn't argue the law. That aspect of accessory is not present in Canadian law. Nothing in Canadian law compels you to report a crime. That is particular to the United States.

Of course, if I were arguing American law, I'd probably not have the little Canadian flag beside my name.

Obstruction:

Basically its giving an authoritative body false information to prevent the investigation from finding the guilty person.

Too bad no authority figure had ever asked for assistance or information.
