First off, you learn about this stuff in history, and how it was wrong. So they either must not pick up a history book, or their mom decides to tell them everything and they don't question it.

To be honest, it's human's instinct to question what they are told. Usually it's better to than blindly follow what you are told. Maybe you don't realize, but the majority of teens DO question what they are told. Why? Well, if I'm not mistaken, it's around the time you become a teen that your brain develops it's "commen sense" part. Although it still isn't fully developed, it develops somewhat, hence why teens pretty much always have to be in an argument and whatnot.

Therefore, they either have a brain disorder, or decide not to listen to their commen sense and blindly follow their mother/father.

If the latter, then they truely are fools.
You just don't understand this concept, do you?

How can you question something when you have no reason to challenge what you're taught? If these girls went to public schools, then I can say I'd agree, but these girls have nothing to compare their ideas to. They're kept in a White Supremest environment. All they know and see is what they're taught.

The thing is, these girls are now just barely 15, and I doubt they've given much of a chance to experience different viewpoints. You can't expect a child to disagree with their parents when they're only surrounded by that viewpoint.

Think of it this way... if you're home schooled by very strict, Christian parents. All you have been taught is Christianity and Christian morals. You never hear of any questioning whether or not God exists. You're completely surrounded by Christian teachings. Do you think you're going to, on your own, suddenly ask yourself, "is there really a God?" Very unlikely that you would. Why? Because you're completely surrounded by God-filled teachings.
