Not if they act that way, they don't deserve it. If you're going to be lenient with cheaters, then make every cheater have a second chance, and when that chance is broken then ban. However, people have already gotten second chances broken and yet they somehow get more still yet. Strange.

He knew it was wrong yet he continued to cheat - even after being banned on more popular servers that would have served as a wakeup call, yet it didn't phase him.

He can say whatever he likes to troop but compared to troop, at least troop never cheated.

anybody else > troop > cheaters

It's just a really bad policy to only give chances to some people and not to others. There have been many people who've been sorry and haven't been shown any leniency, why shouldn't they get any second chances if other people do?

That goes with pretty much anyone. If the guy who discovers the ultimate cure for cancer or whatever and ultimately saves millions of lives, should he get a second chance if he murders some people? It's not for the cheater's dissatisfaction that someone is banned, but more the fact that a person ought to be banned based on the fact of what he did wrong to the countless players he affected.

I was all for pretty much not caring about him until he talked about ignoring the bans that were placed and changing his IP and what-not. What is it? 2 steps back for cheating, one step forward for admitting, and then 2 steps back for evading bans that are completely justified? He can talk about flaming him all he wants and act like it would be immature, but I think that just shows his maturity right there. "I deserve a second chance and I'll force it by evading my bans" Why don't you instead just deal with it? I've been banned by countless servers for doing nothing wrong and haven't done anything to get by the bans. Well, except for trying to reason with the server admins/mods, explaining I wasn't cheating. That's a hard challenge though.

Either way, it's his own choice whether he wants to evade it. But I doubt I'll actually believe him if he responds now and says he changes his mind about not trying to evade the bans. Only a liar/someone deceitful would think to do something like that.
