You know what would fix this? Instead of forcing kids to go to certain schools (except private, of course), we give parents "vouchers" to send their kids wherever the hell they want whether it be private or public. This way, we create a competitive market for your education. Now I know "competition" between schools sounds like the kids would miss out, but hear me out. When business have to compete against each other, prices drop and quality improves. This is a result of Capitalism. If we apply the same Capitalistic principles to schools, we can only expect schools to improve curriculum and environment and lower the frivolous spending of schools.

How does this apply to your situation? Schools won't be able to make up stupid policies (private or public) without approval else they may lose students. In a free market (Capitalist) society, competition and the demand side of the market forces the supply side to play to their consumers rather than to their own pockets.

Yeah, I know, it's brilliant. You can thank Neal Boortz for putting it into his latest book.
