
Subject: Re: A school's pethetic "policy".
Posted by Carrierll on Tue, 13 Mar 2007 15:40:25 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

I want to join in!

Seriously - in the UK, schools can be summed up in Dave Anderson's wonderful "students can't behave, are morally and mentally disabled and very disrespectful to everyone around them."

However, I have been to a private school (because of this, and my dad's salary :S) and it was much the same, only they could kick the pupils out if it was really bad.

I also think that j_ball's comment on having schools "compete" is very good, we have something similar already here in the UK - school league tables, whereby schools are ranked based on academic performance. It's a good idea, but it generally results in this:

- 1: School does well, and gets to top of league table
- 2: Said School then has massive influx of new pupils becuae it's good
- 3: Said school struggles under the student load and begins to perform badly
- 4: School sinks to base of league table, and stays there

Yay.

P.s - Ever noticed that almost everyone on the internet appears to have the same experience at school?
