Sure, it will. However, the ones that are left will be much more equipped to handle their students and provide them with a better education than no competition provided.

At first, most students will probably stay at their current schools to finish high school. At least, the upperclassmen. During those transition years, the schools should, theoretically, have time to start building a better curriculum, so when it really matters, the schools will be improving.

At least, that's what I picture.
