The sheer amount that this fucker is asking for should be grounds for dismissal all on its own. There's no way anybody deserves $67 million for a pair of fucking pants. Neither is there any way that anyone deserves $500,000 for "emotional damages" because they lost a pair of fucking pants. For that matter, anybody who asks for the compensation of legal fees to the tune of $542,500 when they are representing their own sick, malicious ass ought to be drawn and quartered. Hell, anyone who sues for $15,000 for car rentals so they can drive to a different business is outta their gourd, too. The judge ought to see this for what it is: a malicious prick exploiting the legal system in a pathetic attempt to retire early on somebody else's hard earned money. That is what makes this suit frivolous.

It may have legal grounds- but if something this obscenely outlandish is legal, doesn't that show a glaring flaw in our legal system that needs to be fixed right fucking now?
