I prefer to run my Fraps at only 25 fps, half-size from 1024x768 fullscreen mode. It saves a bunch of space in the raw files, and since my hardware can take a bit more abuse than that, the video and my ingame controls run smoothly unless I forgot to defrag recently. You really only need 25 fps, since the minimum threshold for fluid motion in human vision is 24 fps. You can go 30 fps if you want it to look slightly more fluid, but remember that you're going to have to compress your video anyway before showing it to anyone else, so some of that motion quality is going to deteriorate.
