In a little under 4 hours from now, I will be reporting to an oral surgeon to have all 4 of my wisdom teeth removed. I have been putting this off for a while but the pain is getting unbearable, so it has to be done. Two of the teeth have cavities, which is apparently rather common since they are partially erupted and difficult to reach with my toothbrush.

My brother went to this same surgeon to have his removed a couple years ago, and he was given whatever sedative makes you completely not remember the procedure at all, so I hope to get the same. My sister had hers done with laughing gas and she remembers the doctor pulling and prying her teeth but at the time she didn't care. I don't want to remember it.

Also, my grandma went to the emergency room barely responding with a high temperature last night. I haven't heard exactly what caused it, but she is apparently improving in the CVICU (Cardiovascular Intensive Care Unit) - please send your best wishes her way and your curses and epithets to /dev/null.
