What's weird is that I wasn't given that tool (plastic pipette or something?) to rinse the holes, so I had to carefully swish stuff out. My mom remembered having a tool back when she had her wisdom teeth removed. Go figure. Also, instead of laughing gas or a knockout drug, I just got a whole bunch of novocaine shots. Fortunately, this guy really knew what he was doing, and only the few necessary injections in my pallette hurt (quite severely, but it was unavoidable).

I most definitely did NOT want to be awake for the procedure. Period. My sister did it on laughing gas and apparently the surgeon was putting his foot on the chair to brace himself to pull her teeth and she didn't even care. It might have been an interesting memory, but no... I did get some Valium, too... which made me very humorous and laughing.

Quote:Anyway, as long as you keep taking your hydrocodone on schedule, you shouldn't have any aches or other pains strong enough to be debilitating. If the dentist did a good enough job, you might not even need the entire first bottle. Since you won't need those extras, you can just mail them to Dr. House

My swelling is already down, but I have been sleeping for most of the time since the procedure. I have to work in 6 hours, so even though I'm pretty well awake and have just had something like 10 hours of sleep, I should take another nap before work time.
