It is people like you and Halo that cannot give an answer without a discussion. I wonder why not? Are you unable to think for yourself?

Don't set a 'rule' for a topic if you don't go by it yourself:

Quote:Recent attacks in the UK, both England and Scotland have proven that no-one is safe. Over the weekend Scotland has seen Glasgow Airport come under attack, then we had a foiled attack at the next major hospital nearest to the same Airport. Suspects have been arrested in England.....An attempted chemical incident on one of the major motorways in England.

What should we do with the arrested? (90% severe burns to one of them....hes dead in a few days)

I have been informed (not reliably at the moment) that France deports terrorists back to the country of origin. ie if the terrorist is born in France, they then look at the parents, grandparents and so on until a country of origin is established.

On this note, I would send every Muslim good or bad, suspect or otherwise back to their country of origin. It will not happen but a place to begin with, is the 1500 suspects already known to the Government.

Do not sit and think that these attacks will not personally affect you or your family, it will.

I was on duty in the Fire Station when the call came in to say there was a terrorist attack on the Airport. Not nice.

My mate was also flying out to Ibiza from the same airport, several hours later, not a chance in hell. Glasgow City centre was devoid of party-goers on Saturday night following the attack.

This is what fear does to the country.

So how would you deal with the threat or how "are" you dealing with it?

You asked a couple of questions, and gave alot of points up for discussions. Those points are marked red, the questions green, and your answer to the question in blue.

You come to a discussion forum (to the debate section too) expecting a straight answer and then for people to leave?

You want that, there wouldn't be anything up for debate, and to get that, you'd need to present a straight question. (IE: What did you have for breakfast today?)
