You shouldn't need to install drivers for a router, wtf.
If your ISP can't help you then you're fucked. You probably just have your router and computers configured wrong. I honestly don't know exactly who you should call, but they should be a network technician.
If you have any friends who have taken the CCNA courses from the CREATE/CISCO program(I think they have that near you too) in school then you should see if they can help you. I would try to help but I'm incredibly busy lately and it would take some time. x.x

Or, your router probably comes with directions on setting it up LOL
