I posted this in the pits forum during that brief stint that guests were allowed to post without registering, but since that topic is gone, I'll post it here.

It was mentioned that the sniper scope mods were a replacement of a sertain file, or the creation of a new one. So my suggestion is this. If sniper scope mods are to be disallowed to prevent the clickbot from being used, would it be able to use a program to check for that file, or if it's a real file, check the size of the file? If it comes down to the second option, I don't think that with the changes done to the scope view that it would be the same size down to the byte. However, (pointing out the obvious here) the original file, since it's part of the original programing would be the same size as everyone else.
