

---

Subject: Re: Religious - God

Posted by MexPirate on Fri, 05 Oct 2007 15:51:58 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

mrpirate wrote on Fri, 05 October 2007 11:18 If life on earth is the result of a higher being's creation after the Big Bang, was that higher being also created by the Big Bang? If so, how was it created and why did it not need to be created--it surely is/was more complicated than the simple life that began on Earth? If not, does it really make any sense for something to have existed before (for lack of a better word) time and the physical universe?

^^ Love it.

I know that in some way you don't think our existence is an accident, I disagree with that completely and think it's complete 100% pure luck.

God surely didn't create a damn thing if all he did was blow up a big bomb and let everything do it's thing, in some everything was designed each structure was created by humans following that design. I find arguments such as "it's too hard to comprehend" or "the odds are too slim" so therefore God must have done it to be laughable tbh - for me God is a way of people explaining things they don't understand, things that we never used to understand such as evolution God used to be responsible for I think the discovery of these sorts of things and the shift in beliefs of a lot of religious types shows, to me at least, evidence to reinforce my view.

---