We all mature mentally and physically at different ages. To try and put a number on where that happens is absurd because there is no one age.

Kids 10-13 aren't mentally ready for sex. Some may be physically ready, but sex is a little much for someone at that mental stage.

I think sex-ed needs to be taught in schools to younger kids. It shouldn't be an abstinence or safe-sex class, though. It should teach about how bodily functions and mental capacity don't go hand-in-hand and it should be a decision made based on the morals and the mental maturity of the participants.

I see nothing wrong with waiting until you're married. I've always been somewhat disappointed to know that other guys have had my girlfriends before I did. I'm sure that my girlfriends have felt somewhat of the same. It all depends on your morality on the issue. If you're into sharing your body with one person after you've made a lifelong commitment, then that's fine. Don't go away from your morals because of other people telling you that you're stupid. You shouldn't have to be looked down upon, either, if you choose to have sex with several different people before or during (as long as both spouses are on the same page) marriage.
