Morals and parents are getting stricter? HA! That is a ridiculous conclusion you've come to. Morals are, by far, becoming much more relaxed.

If children are exposed to certain things in small doses before peer pressure can get to them, they're much less likely to jump full-force into these things. For instance, if a parent allows their kids to have (small amounts of) alcohol as a child, they're much less likely to go buck-wild when they reach their late teens. The same, I feel, would go for sex. If kids were let in on what happens, they'd be less curious, and they wouldn't be so susceptible to having sex so early. This, clearly, isn't a case of the morals themselves, but the parenting involved.
