Crimson wrote on Sun, 21 October 2007 00:31I use a Mac for work (they bought me a MacBook pro that performs as well as my desktop, and I can dual boot it between Mac and Windows when I need to) - in fact my entire office uses Macs and even the least computer-savvy of them hasn't had any trouble learning how to use it. The outrageously fewer viruses and exploits make the company only need to hire one part-time desktop support guy for 30 employees.

I love my PC, I love my Mac... I use both interchangeably and easily and I based my opinion on actually USING a Mac and USING a PC for years and not basing my opinions on other people's fanboy spewings and uneducated thoughts. When you say that you can't right-click on a Mac, you pretty much label yourself a bumbling retard and unqualified to speak on the issue.... because like others, I use the exact same mouse on both my Windows desktop and my Mac laptop with no problems at all.

Also, even a retard with 65 IQ points can figure out iTunes and can make it not automatically sync their iPod or whatever else you need it to do. If you can't figure that out, you have issues.

This is a kind of reply that i was looking for, however it went offtopic due to the uneducated morons who posted first.

What are your opinions on Leopard Crimson? Are you going to be getting it, or is your workplace buying it for you? You must have seen some keynote speeches about it.