Seems like a link abstinence believers keep in their bookmarks to pull out when they need it.

Sperm doesn't just slip through latex, you'd only get pregnant with a condom if you use it improperly, like let it fall out while you're in a girl or something then yeah she's going to get pregnant. You're virtually 100% protected from pregnancy if you have a condom and the girl is on birth control.

Well, I'm not going to pretend like I know that the counterexample you provided isn't true because for all I know, it could be. I don't necessarily believe in abstinence, I just believe that the age the schools are giving these contraceptives out is way too young. At 13 I wasn't thinking about sex at all, I was fully immersed in football and school. If children this young were to have sex, they couldn't possibly think about how serious the ramifications could be.

FYI, I've done the probability rate of pregnancy for a condom and the pill in the past, and I think the figure came out to be a .002% failure rate. That was around 2 years ago so don't quote me on that.
