Acting on Curiosity = Purposely and distinctively preforming

It doesn't matter your level of curiosity, you still need to put in the work to do what ever your curious about.

You see a box, and think: "Hey, I wonder what is in that box." Than you go and open it. You purposely act upon the box to open it, requiring your own conscious to do so.

Curiosity isn't some form of mind control that makes you do things that you don't want.

Also, like I said above, I haven't followed much of the argument, so I have no idea who's side I took... or if any side..

TBH, there were no sides.

Both of us were saying the same thing but unfortunately, some people can only see in black and white. The moment I brought up curiosity, I was labeled by our well-educated political commentator Jball as a Liberal and from then on...all his arguments were misdirected at a person who he thought was a Liberal but was not.

I have no stinking idea what a fucking Liberal is...I have rather liberal views but I am very practical about things. I NEVER said that and I believe curiosity is not an excuse in this situation. Read topic please.

I merely said that human emotion also played a part but NEVER said curiosity was a mind control that made the person do the deed. To assume that is what I was saying was purely ignorant and shows that some people need some basic analytical reading skills.

When he said "I don't give a fuck what curiosity does," and the way he wrote, it seemed to me that Jball was not acknowledging basic human emotion WHICH is the reason I started arguing and this whole dumb thread became serious. Well, he did clarify that later and I cooled off. Just more evidence that it helps to not be vague in the first place.
