Well thats a problem too then isn't it (If you refuse to believe anything unless you personally see it)? So even if 3,000 people reported seeing something, including officials and whatnot, it didn't happen just because you weren't there?

This brings up another question...is there any person credible enough that they could say they saw something, and someone would even consider believing them? The former gov of Arizona and "high-ranking" government officials are obviously not credible, as everyone in this thread already assumes they are lying or just don't believe them (before they have even heard what they have to say lol).

If the president himself went on TV and said that he saw a spacecraft and aliens visited the white house, people would just be like "lawl bush is an idiot anyway I dont believe him".

It's a bit odd that people believe in other things that they cannot see (God, fate, luck, etc), but won't believe something that their best friend tells them they saw, or that thousands of others swear they experienced.
