The reason sales are so high, is because people held back, and waited for the new unit. It was pent up demand. Those numbers will fall shortly, and I will bet that the Wii will once again become the dominant seller.

The Wii is selling at a slightly lower level because the price was right, right at the beginning, so those who wanted it could get it.

Besides, Japan's sales are just one half of the picture, and the Japanese tend to harbour (pun intended?) a general distaste for anything North American.

Jump to North America, and the Xbox still reigns king.
