Aprime wrote on Thu, 06 December 2007 16:38 Wiis are widely available in Canada, that I can say. But I wouldn't think it's the case in Japan (in other, more common-man terms: I think you're making that up, or your friend is). From what I know, it's just as available as it is in the US... Or perhaps he knows something most people don't: a lot of consoles are kept in stores' storage rooms, giving the impression that they're out of stock, while it isn't the case.

1.8 million? Explain how they sold over 13 million so far if their production cap is 1.8 million a year. 10 times more? Please, stop pulling those crap numbers out of your ass.

Need I remind you, DSes are as common as cellphones in Japan, they're a tool of the trade, they're used in classes to teach English. Yes, the tuner (just like any other software for the DS released in Japan) keeps sales strong for a considerable period of time.

Could you be any more biased/misinformed in your next post?

I disagree with your first part, but agree with the second. I thought it strange that only 1.8 mill was stated where as I know they at least sold 13 mil the last time I checked, which was a while ago.

But the "Availability" you speak of is like this: "The Wii has been out of stock across store shelves since its debut in 06."

If a store, such as gamestop, gets a shipment in one day, it would be sold out by the end of the day.
