So fucking simple.

So governments should be spending tax payer money on jailing people for putting substances into THEIR bodies? Nope, that doesn't cost a shitload of money. GOOD IDEA.

In fact, is it a really good idea in the long run, open your mind.

The entire cost of a druggie impact on society is more then it would to keep them in a cell for a few weeks till they get over it.

Most people who take drugs, do crime, though-out that crime, people can get hurt, so there is medical costs, the cost of fixing whatever they just done, like breaking in a car or something, the cost of the police dealing with them, the time for the police to deal with them, then, the court costs, honesty, the list goes on and on.

All you need to do is stick them in a room for 6 weeks, not let the fuckers out expect for walks in a closed space and showers.

You can feed people for a day on less then 1 pound, depending how cheap you wanna go, yes, there is the cost of guards and the costs of running a building, but that is small to the cost they do on the outside.

That's if you wanted a building to house them, myself, I would use a unused ex army base, build a few wooden buildings with small rooms, could even use tents, shit, the little details like that, could be thought off later.

To bad that having a drug addict convicted (in a country with trias politica) is time consuming and costly.

Besides that I know for a fact that having someone locked up in a cell in the Netherlands costs about 300 euros a day (which will probably be not much different from most western europe countries), excluding any help to get rid of the addiction...

Besides that, you would need to make extra cells avaible, which would mean building more prisons, or releasing more serious criminals.

And, locking them up doesn't some the (potential) AIDS problem, which seems to me like the primary concern in this case.

As of course, none wants drug addicts.

Then again, something worse then a drug addict is a drug addict with AIDS.
