

---

Subject: Re: Election '08

Posted by cheesesoda on Tue, 08 Jan 2008 02:31:14 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

Muad Dib15 wrote on Mon, 07 January 2008 19:51

Ron Paul is too much of a fanatic for me, I would have to say Fred Thompson, or Mitt Romey. Constitutionalism is NOT fanaticism. They seem like radical ideals, but they're simple ideas of small government that everybody is afraid of for no real good reason. People are so used to big government, it scares them to imagine a world without such interference. It's like taking a blanket away from a small child. The child doesn't need the blanket, but it doesn't know anything else. The fact is, the child ends up being better off without it because now it doesn't have a disease-infested strip of fabric attached to its hand, it no longer slows the child down when playing, and the child learns to rely on himself to be confident rather than the blanket. The same goes for government, it's nothing but a disease-infested organization that doesn't really have a place playing a major part in one's every day life. Getting rid of it would certainly help the economy, and it would force Americans to rely on themselves (as they did for 150 years before the 1930s) instead of government.

---